[Opportunity and clinical action: contribution of the general physician in the prevention of Alzheimer's disease]. Alzheimer's disease is a neurodegenerative disorder characterized by a progressive dementia. Although its etiology remains poorly understood, it is known to be caused by interacting factors. These factors are strongly conditioned by genetic factors and by environmental factors, among which nutrition is considered to be the most important. Treatment of these factors has had important improvements, but new advances are needed to find approaches based on prevention. Neurological and mental examinations should allow the identification of patients at high risk of developing dementia as well as of atypical dementia and/or of early manifestations of Alzheimer's disease. In this context, general practitioners (GP) can take measures to reduce the risks of cognitive impairment in the general population. This article is a review of the most important factors associated with cognitive disorders and their relationship with Alzheimer's disease. It reviews the diagnostic and therapeutic strategies of cognitive disorders and the usefulness of cognitive screening tests. We also present useful tests, in particular tests of cognitive reserve, which are valuable for identification of high-risk populations. In this regard, we suggest nutritional intervention strategies and propose a preventive strategy based on the modification of relevant lifestyle factors. Q: What is the Unix file system in PTH? I have been learning Perl, and I came across this phrase. In a Unix-like operating system, such as Linux, MacOS X or Unix, we can see that the files and folders are organized in directories. A single file is not stored on the hard disk, but the hard disk is divided into small portions, called "blocks" which the operating system uses to store files. The user of the operating system can address files by their name. To access a file, the file name must be found within the directory. The directory name is stored in a global variable called a "hash." Can someone please explain this to me? What is a Unix-like operating system and how is this file system different from Windows operating systems? A: The lines in a Unix-like operating system, such as Linux, MacOS X or Unix, we can see that the files and folders are organized in directories.
