Many methods have been described for the treatment of chronic lateral knee pain. Therapeutic procedures are aimed at correct mechanical alignment of the knee joint and patello-femoral joint. This can be achieved by using the correct surgical technique and specifically through the use of the "Swan-NECK" and "STRETTA" techniques. Most of the published data on the application of the STRETTA-technique has been published as a case series describing the clinical improvement of several patients. Only little data are available about the application of the Swan-NECK-technique for the treatment of lateral knee pain. In the present study the different therapeutic options for lateral knee pain were evaluated and a comparison of the various techniques was done. It was found that the Swan-NECK-technique yielded a significantly better clinical outcome compared to the classic STRETTA-technique.

To analyse the role of viral factors in the pathogenesis of alcoholic cirrhosis and hepatocellular carcinoma (HCC), as well as to assess the impact of cryotherapy on these neoplasms. Between 1975 and 1990, 151 Greek patients with alcohol-related liver cirrhosis and 50 HCC patients were examined retrospectively for the presence of HBsAg, HCV-Antigen and HCV-RNA. The role of HCV-RNA in the development of HCC was assessed also in 61 HCC patients who were not HBsAg carriers. Auto-immune hepatitis (AIH) was diagnosed according to the criteria of the International Autoimmune Hepatitis Group. Anti-HCV positivity was present in 7.7% of alcoholics and in 5.0% of HCC patients, anti-HCV/HCV-RNA positivity in 2.6% and 2.9%, respectively. Anti-HBs positivity was present in 17.7% of cirrhotics and in 48.0% of HCC patients, while anti-HBs/HCV-RNA positivity was observed in 2.6% and in 3.3% of them, respectively. HBsAg positivity was found in 47.2% and in 86.0% of HCC patients, respectively. Hepatitis B was the most important etiological factor of HCC, while HCV-RNA was the second. Alcoholic cirrhosis and AIH are important precirrhotic states, which favour the development of HCC. Intensive alcohol abuse, immunosuppression and HCV-related chronic liver diseases seem to act as cofactors in hepatocarcinogenesis.Q: What happens when a user cancels a SSIS package What happens when a user cancels a SSIS package, will all the files get cleaned and deleted? A: The user interface (UI) for SSIS packages does not provide any direct method of canceling packages. One approach would be to set a boolean or flag in an output control for a target to the "Cancel" value and then use a script task or other code to reset that value once
